Can you tell me about a recent concert or a music event you attended by yourself, what made you decide to go alone and what was that experience like from arrival until the performance started? I'm trying to remember what the last music event was. I think I went to, would you consider a rave? I went to a rave with my friends though. We got ready together, then we got to the venue, lined up, and then we just got in and listened to the music and it was really nice.

Yeah, just a bit crowded as these raves and stuff tend to be. But yeah, once it ended, then we left. We got over and we went home.

What do you usually do during the time before the main act starts when you're attending alone? Usually I'll just listen to the opening act and kind of just like text my friends awkwardly like, ha ha ha, I'm alone. Reply to all the texts. Yeah, reply to all the texts.

It's basically like, not even like pre-performance, even before that. Yeah, because you know there's usually an opening act before the main act, yeah. No, even before that.

Oh, before that. I mean like, sometimes if there's someone chill in the line, then I'll chat with them because I feel like I'm a pretty chatty person. Or even when we're inside the venue, I'll chat a bit.

Because I feel like oftentimes people come to these events with their friends, so it's kind of a bit of a barrier to go and approach someone. Have you ever wanted to talk to another person at a concert but decided not to? Can you describe what was happening, what you wanted to say, do, or what stopped you? Yeah, I feel like oftentimes the reason why I decide I want to talk to someone is like, oh they have a cool outfit, or like cool vibes. But I usually stop because I'm like, oh they're like with someone, I don't want to like intrude.

So yeah. Even when they're by themselves? I mean, usually not by themselves. So I'm just like, okay.

But then you're open to... Yeah, I'd be open to talk to them, but I don't want to be like an awkward like, hey! Yeah. Can you recall a time when you had a positive interaction with someone you did not know at a concert? And then how did the interaction begin? Or what made it feel comfortable? Or did anything in the venue or even made it easier? There was one time after a concert, I was like standing next to a girl for like the whole time. And then afterwards, I was like, oh, I really like your outfit.

And then we like help each other take photos. And then we were just like, talking for a bit after we walked to like the train station together, and we just left. So I guess, like, yeah, since it was the end of the concert, and it was like, you know, everyone's kind of leaving was kind of natural to like, you know, take photos and leave together.

And like, since we're both girls, like you can just go together and it's safer. Yeah. When you arrive alone at a concert, what helps you feel comfortable, included or part of the crowd? Or what can make you feel isolated or awkward or unsafe? I feel like, like, like I said, a lot of the people like come with their friends.

So if I go by myself, I'm kind of like, oh, I have no one to talk to. And then I feel really isolated. But like, every now and then, there's like a, you know, there's like a nice group of friends.

And they're like, oh my gosh, she came alone. Let's adopt you for the night. I'm like, okay.

So then yeah, that's like in those circumstances. And yeah, but I guess like, it's kind of just the vibes of the people. Yeah.

And then how do you decide whether another concertgoer or someone in the crowd is open to talking? Like, is there any signals? Do you notice or any body language? I... Okay, like this is such a bad measurement, like vibes. Okay, but if I were to quantify vibes. I mean, that's like a generalized question.

How do you quantify vibes? Okay, let me get there. I think like their body language, they're usually like, like if they're on their phone, that's like a no, because they're doing something. If they're kind of like looking around, or like taking a photo, then that's like maybe they're a bit more open.

I think it's mainly like if they're on their phone or not. Because if they're on their phone, that's kind of like a, I don't really want to talk. But then you're also on your phone when you're by yourself.

Sometimes. Sometimes. Sometimes, yeah.

It depends. So that's how you quantify vibes, basically. And just body language, like if they seem more like open, like looking around, or if they're like not really looking around.

Also just like, if they, I don't know, dress up at school, I'll be like, oh, they must be a cool person to talk to. You know, like have them. Yeah.

So like, how they dress or how they present themselves could be a way to quantify vibes. Potentially, yeah. Alright, that was all the questions I had.

I have one more. Sure. Like just to get your opinion on it.

Sure. So imagine a concert offered an optional way for solo attendees to take part in a shared activity or connect with other fans before the show. What would make you feel comfortable using it or what would make you avoid it? This is like an in-person one or an online one? In-person one, yeah.

Like when you're there. I think I wouldn't mind going. I always like getting to know people.

Yeah, I'd be keen if it was like, like officially hosted by the artist. But if it was not, I'd be a bit hesitant because I'm like, oh, what if this is like a scam? Especially if it's like free or they have like free goodies. Like I'd be so down to like get some like exclusive merch or like a poster or something like that.

I mean, it doesn't have to be artists. It could be hosted by the team management team or the people who are organizing the venue. Yeah, like the venue or like, yeah, as long as it's like somewhat legit.

There's some credibility there. Yeah, there's some credibility of like, yeah, I don't mind going. Awesome.

That was all my questions. Do you have anything else to add? No. Awesome.

Thank you so much for your time.
